

Iran will be bombed if it persists in developing nuke weapons: Trump

AFP, WASHINGTON: US President Donald Trump has threatened that Iran will be bombed if it persists in developing nuclear weapons.

Trump's language represented a sharpening of his comment a few days earlier that if Tehran refused to negotiate a new nuclear agreement, "bad, bad things are going to happen to Iran". It was not clear whether Trump was threatening bombing by US planes alone or perhaps in an operation coordinated with Israel.

"If they don't make a deal, there will be bombing," NBC News said the President told one of its correspondents in an interview late Saturday. It said he also threatened to punish Iran with what he called "secondary tariffs".

Trump's language represented a sharpening of his comment a few days earlier that if Tehran refused to negotiate a new nuclear agreement, "bad, bad things are going to happen to Iran".

It was not clear whether Trump was threatening bombing by US planes alone or perhaps in an operation coordinated with Israel.

Israeli Foreign Minister Gideon Saar told Politico late last month that "in order to stop a nuclear Iranian program before it will be weaponised, a reliable military option should be on the table."

Analysts have said Iran may be just weeks away from producing a deliverable nuclear weapon -- though Tehran denies it is building such arms. Either way, such an attack carries a risk of spreading to a wider conflict. Trump in 2018 pulled the United States out of an agreement to relieve sanctions on Iran in return for curbs on its nuclear programme.
